Before joining the University of Missouri faculty in 2010, Frank directed the Colorado Water Workshop at Western State Colorado University. There, he brought together scholars, students, industry and policy makers to address pressing issues of water in the western states. Frank’s first book, “Making Rocky Mountain National Park: The Environmental History of an American Treasure,” was enthusiastically received by scholars and lay readers. He is currently working on a second book exploring the recreational use of water in the American West.

For several years, Frank served as Faculty Fellow of The Mizzou Advantage, an initiative capitalizing on MU’s greatest strengths. As its leader, Frank encouraged connections among experts on campus, around the nation and across the globe.

Frank is also a dedicated educator who has designed and delivered more than a dozen undergraduate and graduate courses over his career. He is especially interested in service and experiential learning, and he has led a field-based course examining the environmental history of natural disasters. For his excellence in the classroom, Frank was awarded the Provost’s Outstanding Junior Faculty Teaching Award in 2013.

Dr. Jerry Frank is an associate professor of history in the College of Arts and Science.
